Each candlestick typically shows one day, it is like a combination of line-chart and bar chart. Each bar represents the four relevant aspects the high, low, opening and closing. Candlesticks are usually composed of the body (black or white), and an upper and a lower shadow: the area between the open and the close is called the real body, price excursions above and below the real body are called shadows.

Tall candles perform better than short ones. To determine whether the candle is short or tall, compute its height from highest high to lowest low price in the candle pattern and divide by the breakout price. A zero median means separating lines have a number of candles with no shadow. In many candlestick types, tall shadows outperform.
